ALLIES' RUSH HALTED; GERMANS HOLD LINE

Berlin Believes Foe's Offensive Will Crumble Into Trench Warfare.

By CARL W. ACKERMAN. BERLIN (via The Hague), Sept. 28. The first rush of the Anglo-French troops in the west has been met and

The second rush, it is promised, will be dealt with even more effectively. There is every confidence that what was planned as a great offensive movement will crumble into mere trench warfare before the end of the week.

In spite of the check administered by the Germans in the fighting of Sunday night and early yesterday, the ailles are expected to return to the attack. The opinion prevails in Berlin that the onslaughts against the German post tions will last for at least a week unless a disaster like that experienced by the British at Neuve Chapelle halts the Several weeks' shell fire had partly demolished the advanced German trenches and it was considered useless trenches and it was considered useless to defend them at heavy cost of life. For that reason the Germans fell back in the Champagne and released their grip on a narrow trench front at Loos. In the second day's fighting, no such easy task confronted the French infantry. Their artillery had not blown in the second line trenches and from behind these works the Germans maintained themselves without yielding.

have concentrated their major strength apparently in this district, for they continue to hold all their first-line positions in advance of Lilie. The British gains to the south of Lilie are not of such a nature as to affect France's great industrial center. They are being made chiefly near Lens, seventeen miles southwest of Lilie.

The Lens operations of the British are in co-speration with the French attacks north of Arras. This double movement apparently has been planned to reach Doual, about twenty miles directly south of Lilie. Doual and Lilie are the two principal advance supply stations and railway centers for the German armies in the west. Their capture by the alilies would free a considerable area of northwestern France. The immediate objective of the French offensive in Champagne is the railway which connects the German central positions with the environs of the crown prince's field headquarters at Montfaucon. The French are now almost in sight of this railway. The town of Somme-Py, mentioned in the French official dispatch, commands it at a principal highway crossing, twenty-five fall would not compel the erown prince to move his advance positions further back, but would help the French to move to the east. It is at the eastern end of the new French positions that the Germans are holding best. As long as they remain immovable there the crown prince's army is safe.
